Step 3: Research
Now that you have had a chance to look carefully and begin forming your own ideas about this work of art, feel free to read the label reprinted on the back of this brochure. It provides information you cannot get simply by looking at the object.

When you have finished reading the label, consider the following:

Does the information in the label reinforce what you observed and deduced on your own? How?

Did it mention anything you did not see or think about previously? What?

How would your experience of this painting have been different if you read the label first?

Step 4: Interpretation
Interpretation involves bringing your close observation, analysis, and any additional information you have gathered about an art object together to try to understand what a work of art means.

There can be multiple interpretations of a work of art. The best-informed ones are based on visual evidence and accurate research.

Some interpretive questions to consider for this painting might be:

Why would Lilly Martin Spencer choose to paint her own washerwoman?

Is this a romantic or realistic depiction of a servant's life?

Who would want to buy a painting of a washerwoman in 1850?

Why?

How do you think this washerwoman might have felt about this painting?

Step 5: Critical Assessment and Response
This final stage involves a judgment of the success of a work of art. Critical assessment involves questions of value and can include more personal and subjective responses to art.

Do you think this painting is successful and well done?

Do you like it? Does it move you? Is it relevant to your life?

How can I learn more?

What might it mean?

What do I think?

This work was painted by a woman artist, Lilly Martin Spencer, who was one of the very few female artists of her era to earn her livelihood and to achieve national recognition as a painter. Through the sale of her works she supported, albeit with difficulty, her husband and thirteen children (seven of whom survived to maturity).

Lilly Martin Spencer, American, 1822–1902

The Jolly Washerwoman

1851

Oil on canvas

Purchased through a gift from Florence B. Moore in memory of her husband, Lansing P. Moore, Class of 1937; P.993.25

We hope this approach enhanced your exploration and enjoyment of this painting. If you like, you can try this method with other works of art. Simply ask yourself with each object:

What do I see? (Close Observation)

What might it mean? (Research)

How can I learn more? (Analysis)

How do I feel about it? (Critical Assessment and Response)

We thank you for taking the time to engage with this painting. We hope you have gained something from your experience of it that you can carry with you into your future.

The brochure was written by Vivian Ladd, Museum Educator, and Barbara J. MacAdam, Jonathan L. Cohen Center of American Art.

The Hood Museum of Art thanks Judy and Charles H. Moore Class of 1931, for their support of this brochure.

© 2010 Trustees of Dartmouth College.

The Jolly Washerwoman depicts Spencer’s own servant—probably Jane Thompson, a Scottish-born woman, who was listed as the household’s domestic servant in the 1850 census. She was likely to have been among the thousands of immigrants who fled Scotland and Ireland beginning in the late 1840s owing to a widespread food crisis caused by a potato blight. Irish and Scottish immigrants made up a large portion of the service classes in New York City, where Spencer worked at this time.

Spencer depicts her servant at close range, cheerfully doing the household laundry. The original round-arched frame—a format typically associated with religious subjects—enhances the artist's monumental presentation of a seemingly mundane and female-associated subject. As in other kitchen scenes by Spencer, the subject engages the viewer with a direct gaze and broad, toothy smile, an expression rarely found in paintings of upper-class scenes. This most likely occurred at the turn of the twentieth century, when a European painting would have held more value than an American painting by a female artist whose paintings had by then fallen out of fashion.

Some of the most intriguing questions surrounding this work cannot be answered with any certainty. First and foremost, why did Spencer choose to paint her servant directly engaging the audience with a broad grin, as if sharing a joke? By choosing to capture such an expression, was the artist commemorating the ideals of the happy, compliant servant and of feminine domesticity, or did she subtly undermine such standards with the work’s humorous tone, which some critics found unseemly for a female artist? And for whom did Spencer intend the work? Although wealthy collectors might enjoy images of happy servants, the comic element of this and other kitchen subjects by Spencer broke with conventions of gentility and high art.

The fact that several of her paintings were reproduced as prints suggests that she may have intended such subjects for the growing middle classes. The images may have held particular appeal for women, who by the mid-nineteenth century were beginning to take a more active role as consumers of household goods.
A Closer Look

As a teaching museum, the Hood Museum of Art is committed to helping visitors develop visual literacy skills—the ability to construct meaning from all that we see. One way it does this is through a method called Learning to Look. This five-step approach to exploring works of art is designed to empower visitors to observe carefully and think critically about any work of art they encounter.

Simply follow the steps below to practice this technique.

Step 1: Close Observation
Look carefully at this painting.
What do you notice about this woman? Her body? Her pose? Her dress?

What do you notice about her arms and hands? What do you notice about the laundry process?

What do you notice about her face? Her expression? Her hairstyle?
The clothes that have been washed?
The clothes that have yet to be washed?

What is on the table in the background?

Step 2: Analysis
Without reading the label, think about all of this visual information.
Who do you think this woman might be?
When do you think she lived? Where do you think she lived? Why?

What was she doing just before the moment captured in this painting? How do you know?

As you consider each of these questions, look to the painting for clues to support your ideas.